

CLIMATIC CHANGES IN MEDITERRANEAN AND GREECE: A CRITICAL REVIEW

Haralambos FEIDAS¹, Dimitrios LALAS²

¹ Department of Geography, University of Aegean, Faonos & Har. Trikoupi, Mytilene,
81100, GREECE

² National Observatory of Athens, Lofos Nymfon, Athens, 11810, GREECE

ABSTRACT

Global surface temperatures have risen probably due to the increase of the green house gases concentrations, emitted by human activities. As global climate appears to be changing, we would expect the Mediterranean climate also to have changed. This study examines the validity of the previous assumption by drawing on the available data and results of recent studies and reports and reviewing possible future changes in climate together with recent trends, focusing in Mediterranean and especially in Greece.